United States Bureau of Investigation

John Edgar Hoover, Director

Washington, D. C.

VOL. 2 No. 6

JUNE 1, 1933

The United States Bureau of Investigation is charged with the duty of investigating violations of the laws of the United States and collecting evidence in cases in which the United States is or may be a party in interest.

The Bureau does not have investigative jurisdiction over violations of the National Prohibition, Counterfeiting, Narcotic, Customs, Immigration, or Postal Laws.

However, the United States Bureau of Investigation will immediately institute investigations of alleged violations of Federal Laws other than those listed above.

The following list indicates some of the major violations over which the Bureau has investigative jurisdiction:-

National Motor Vehicle Theft Act

National Bankruptcy Act

White Slave Traffic Act

Impersonation of Government Officials

Larceny of Goods in Interstate Commerce

Cases involving transportation in interstate or foreign commerce of any persons who have been kidnapped

Theft, Embezzlement or Illegal Possession of Government Property

Antitrust Laws

National Bank and Federal Reserve Act Violations, such as embezzlement, abstraction or misapplication of funds

Crimes on any kind of Government reservation, including Indian Reservations or in any Government building or other Government property

Neutrality violations, including the shipment of arms to friendly nations

Frauds against the Government

Perjury, embezzlement, or bribery in connection with Federal Statutes or officials

Crimes on the high seas

The location of persons who are fugitives from justice by reason of violations of the Federal Laws over which the Bureau has jurisdiction, of escaped Federal prisoners, and parole and probation violators.

It will be appreciated if information in the possession of law-enforcement officials concerning the above listed violations is promptly forwarded to the Special Agent in Charge of the nearest office of the United States Bureau of Investigation. If the information indicates that immediate action is necessary, telegrams marked "Government Rate Collect" or telephone calls will be accepted. The address of each of the Field offices of this Bureau appears on the inside back cover of this bulletin.

Bol. 2 No. 6

June 1, 1933.

The pages of history portray crimes of major importance which were committed during the earliest days of the known existence of mankind. Sacred history points to a homicide in the first family shortly after the record of the creation of man. Comparatively speaking, therefore, even the oldest organized police force or law-enforcement agency is rather young when considered in connection with the age of crime. Earlier records indicate policies of personal vengeance, exaggerated individualism, and barbaric methods employed in the preservation of recognized human rights. In the modern era, however, the advancing tide of civilization has not left behind the agencies of law enforcement. The same instinctive urge that has caused man to discover new lands, to create new inventions, and to analyze the atom, has caused law-enforcement agencies to take advantage of the forces of discovery, invention, and science in their increasingly effective work of protection and in the administration of justice.

Typical of the modern trend in this direction is the more careful selection of personnel to be engaged in law-enforcement work, followed by an intensive period of training of peace officers, which training, it is now recognized, continues throughout their career in this field of work. Intelligence has come to supplant torture and third degree practices which belonged to the medieval period of police history. Likewise, the ideas of false whiskers and strange disguises have been designated as relics of the past in connection with police work and crime detection. The recent history of crime detection has seen increasingly more intelligent men adopting a law-enforcement career, with an almost universal search for information, followed by the constant acquisition of more knowledge on the part of present-day law-enforcement personnel. The improvements of science in this field of activity have been remarkable during the recent past, with the utilization of the methods of physicists and chemists in the field of crime detection. Finger-print identification is likewise being used more widely than ever before, and another encouraging sign is the increased participation on the part of law-enforcement agencies in submitting crime statistics to the United States Bureau of Investigation. These statistics are compiled to more clearly define the problems of peace officers; they raise questions and the solutions of the problems require the combined efforts of all those interested in improving the situation with reference to crime, and thus give such statistics a significant value in the campaign against criminals.

The peace officers of the nation are likewise to be congratulated upon the fact that more generally than ever before police executives are being selected for reasons similar to those which determine the selection of business executives and leaders in other fields of activity. More attention is being given to matters of economy, methodology, planning, supervision and administration than ever before, as a result of which there are effected greater results with greater efficiency and economy in operations. A further indication of the healthy atmosphere attendant upon the vigorous growth of law enforcement work is that of cooperation. Not only is this cooperation finding actual expression in an exchange of ideas between peace officers, but likewise between police officials and prosecutors. This cooperation has been extended even further with the development of a national clearing house for criminal information, as represented by the Identification Division of this Bureau, in that the courts are calling upon prosecutors and law-enforcement officials for the previous criminal history of convicted persons before the imposition of sentences, in order that the sentence imposed may be in keeping with the character of the criminal who is sentenced. This cooperation has likewise been extended to broader fields, as is demonstrated in the international exchange of fingerprints through this Bureau's Identification Division.

A still further encouraging sign is the fact that law-enforcement agencies are not content with the progress that has been made; that they are not planning to be content with a single burst of speed; but that this progress is active and is increasing steadily and tirelessly in every phase of the work. No more typical example that this progress is continuing actively can be found than in the fact that at an early date the International Association of Chiefs of Police and the International Association for Identification will hold their conventions at Chicago for the purpose of engaging in an exchange of ideas and in planning for continued improvement in the field of crime detection and police work generally. A still further sign of vigorous growth is the fact that the agencies of law-enforcement are being looked upon, not only as major forces for the punishment of wrongs, but they are likewise assuming an important field of activity as a corrective agency and in crime prevention work. The law-enforcement officials and agencies of the nation are to be congratulated upon this progress and upon the many indications that it is being continued more vigorously at the present than ever before, and that plans for still further development have been and are being established.

The United States Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice is proud to be a part of this development and progress, and offers its every cooperation in this warfare against crime and criminals.

For the information of law-enforcement officials, there is set forth below an article concerning a preliminary test of blood stains, by Edwin R. Donaldson, of the Washington, D. C. Police Department.

A PRELIMINARY TEST FOR BLOOD STAINS

By

Edwin R. Donaldson, Micro-Analyst,
Metropolitan Police Department,
District of Columbia.

In the examination of suspected blood stains, a preliminary method by which stains other than those made by blood, are eliminated is being applied by investigators who do not possess expert qualifications as chemists. This method has been developed as a result of practical experience during work on cases at Washington, D. C., and vicinity over a period of approximately two years. It is not designed nor does it operate to supplant the expert. It does provide a means for the selection of material for test by the expert. In the belief that this may be of value to investigators generally, the following description of the method used is offered.

The appearance, condition and location of all stains, and the objects on which they are found, is recorded in the usual notes of the investigation. It is advantageous to examine the stains with a low-powered magnifying glass, and to record the observations. Those stains which appear to be blood are collected. In their preservation they must, of course, be kept from contact with any substances which will affect their chemical composition. Chemically clean containers must be used for this purpose.

Stains on textiles such as clothing, linens, rugs, drapes and upholstered furniture should be cut out and placed in clean vials, pill boxes or envelopes. If the material on which the stain appears has been washed, this will not necessarily prevent the use of the test, as water usually will not remove all traces of the stain. Stains on metals, glass, weapons, varnish-finished woodwork and other small, non-porous articles are scraped off on clean paper and transferred to the container. If the stain has soaked into the wood or other substance, this portion of the wood is cut out. The same procedure is used with other porous or semi-porous materials such as plaster, paper, leather and dirt.

Each container is, of course, separately labeled and referred to in the notes so that its identity is maintained. It is obvious that no two specimens should be grouped together. This precaution is very important.

Many stains - such as iron rust, fungus growths, red paint, sealing wax and ink - have the appearance of blood. The purpose of a preliminary test is to select those specimens which appear to be blood so that they may then be submitted to an expert analyst for further examination, in order to obtain evidence which may be used in court to prove the nature of the stain. If, for any reason, it is believed that the stain may be blood despite this preliminary examination, it should be delivered to an expert analyst in order that it may be further examined. Only a portion of the stain should be used in this examination, the remainder being preserved for the expert if further examinations are to be made.

The first operation is to dissolve the test portion of the stain in a physiological salt solution, which is later described in this article. The age of the stain and the condition in which it has existed determine its solubility. Fresh stains dissolve readily. Stains dried naturally dissolve easier than those acted upon by heat or chemicals.

The portion of the stain to be given this preliminary test is placed in a clean container such as a test tube and covered with physiological salt solution. It is then permitted to remain over night, being covered to prevent any contamination. The material may be stirred with a glass rod in such a way as to assist in causing the stain to dissolve. After a solution has been procured in this way, a portion is transferred to another test tube. To this there is added an equal volume of a benzidine test solution hereinafter described. The resulting mixture is then shaken and the color, if any, observed carefully. If blood is present, a color will appear ranging from a greenish-blue to a pure blue. The depth of the shade depends upon the amount of blood in the stain and the amount of benzidine in the test solution. In order to be sure that the test is being correctly performed, a control test is used in which an equal amount of the original benzidine solution is added in another test tube to an equal amount of the plain salt solution and this placed beside the test tube containing the stain and benzidine. This control test should be colorless.

An alternative method which is used with less difficulty in dissolving the stain, especially when encountered on light colored materials, is to place a chemically clean piece of white blotting or filter paper under the stain. The salt solution is then applied with a glass rod to the top of the stain, or an eye dropper is useful for the purpose of dropping the solution on the stain in this way, while at the same time the stain is manipulated with the glass rod. The benzidine reagent is then applied to the blotter and the color, if the stain is blood, changes to blue. The control test should be carried out by placing the pure salt solution on another piece of blotting paper and applying the benzidine reagent.

A little experience has been found sufficient to enable an investigator to perform this test. It is best to rely completely upon a pharmacist or physician to prepare the benzidine reagent and the salt solution and to assure the certainty that the test tubes, glass rods and other implements are chemically clean. The thin, cheap test tubes should be purchased new for each test and then thrown away. The rod and other implements are cleaned with distilled water. This cleaning may be aided without disturbing the test by the addition of glacial acetic acid to the final rinse water.

In preparing for the test it is advisable for the investigator to present the pharmacist with a list of the things desired. These are: Test tubes; glass rod; eye dropper; chemically clean blotting or filter paper and plain white paper; vials, pill boxes, envelopes or other containers. An inexpensive test tube rack provides a convenient means of holding the test tubes.

The benzidine solution is prepared by placing a few crystals of recrystallized benzidine in the bottom of a test tube and adding grain alcohol until the benzidine just dissolves. Two or three drops of glacial acetic acid are then added and the solution is then shaken well. An equal volume of new 3% hydrogen peroxide is then added and the entire solution is again shaken. (Caution: Do not place the finger tips over the top of the test tube, as a test for blood might result). The solution should be used immediately and it should be prepared fresh for each examination.

The pharmacist is familiar with the proper method of preparing the physiological salt solution (.85%), which is to place about one-fourth of a teaspoonful of common salt in one cup of distilled water. If the pharmacy from which the materials are obtained is some distance from the point where the examination is to be made, it is best to carry the benzidine reagent in two solutions, and then mix them at the place where the examination is made. The solution of benzidine in grain alcohol and glacial acetic acid is kept in one container and the hydrogen peroxide in another, these being mixed at the time of the test. The hydrogen peroxide loses its potency if allowed to stand. Excesses in hydrogen peroxide and glacial acetic acid should be avoided in making a solution. Large amounts of benzidine increase the intensity of the blue color beyond the point of sensitivity. Otherwise, the solution will not be spoiled if the quantities used are reasonably exact.

This test is sensitive to 1 part of blood in 300,000 parts of solution. It may be relied upon for the purpose intended and is simple enough to be utilized by investigators for the selection of stains to be presented for examination by expert analysts.

INSTALLATION OF A SINGLE FINGERPRINT FILE
IN THE IDENTIFICATION DIVISION OF THE
UNITED STATES BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

During recent years considerable attention has been given by identification officers throughout the world to the study of classifying and filing single fingerprints. This branch of the science of fingerprinting differs from the identification systems of Henry, Vucetich and others in that each finger of the hands is given separate treatment and a classification attained for each digit through an analysis of the ridge formations appearing therein. After its classification, the impression of each finger (mounted or recorded on separate cards) is filed separately, and it is thus unnecessary to have all the fingerprints of both hands to effect a subsequent identification.

The primary object, of course, of such a system is to file criminal fingerprints in such a manner that accidental or latent fingerprints such as may be found at the scene of a crime may be searched against the file in an effort to identify them. Incidentally, the development of the single fingerprint system tends to provide information which is frequently needed for the further extension and subdivision of fingerprints comprising a large collection. To this extent any single fingerprint bureau may be considered as a laboratory for further consideration of the more minute and involved application of the fingerprint classification systems.

In February of this year the United States Bureau of Investigation installed a single fingerprint system. Due to the voluminous fingerprint file now in existence in the Bureau, where the fingerprints of approximately 2,200 criminals are received daily, it became necessary to confine this study to the fingerprints of a certain limited class of criminals in order that the single fingerprint file thus developed might be most comprehensive without becoming too large while in its constructive stages. After consideration, the crimes of kidnapping and extortion were selected as being of sufficient general interest to serve a practical purpose and yet prevent the file from growing too rapidly while in the experimental stage. In this field of crime latent fingerprints often will be found to be quite prevalent, on extortion letters, at the scene of the crime, upon the abandoned automobile, at the rendezvous where the victim was held if it be subsequently located, etc. At present this file contains the single fingerprints of approximately 1,000 criminals, whose names have been connected at some time in the past with the crimes of kidnapping or extortion. This means that 10,000 single fingerprints have already been classified and individually filed under the system.

Heretofore it has not been possible for the United States Bureau of Investigation to receive latent fingerprints for comparison or search in its files unless the names of suspects in connection with the crime involved have been furnished and it has been possible to locate their fingerprints. The main fingerprint files of the Bureau contain over 3,500,000 criminal fingerprint cards and it would, of course, be impracticable to attempt to examine a large majority of these cards, classified and filed under the Henry system, in order to attempt to find a fingerprint impression identical with a single latent print.

With the inauguration of a single fingerprint file it is now possible for the Bureau to receive for search through this file latent fingerprints found at the scene of a crime, particularly when such crime is of a kidnapping or extortion nature, and the Bureau invites the contribution for search through this file of latent fingerprint impressions. When such prints are submitted it is preferred, if possible, that they be positive photographs reproducing the latent prints in their actual size and accompanied by a brief description of the nature of the surface upon which the latent prints were found, color of the background, and information regarding the nature of the powders or chemicals which may have been used in the development of the latent prints. Such latent fingerprints will be searched through the single fingerprint files, and if not identified but susceptible of classification they will be filed in the Bureau for possible future identification as new criminal suspects are added to the file. If the crime is not one of kidnapping or extortion the Bureau will be pleased to receive latent fingerprints in connection therewith, provided the names or fingerprints of suspects are furnished in order that the latent impressions may be compared with the fingerprints of such suspects.

Law-enforcement officials who from their files can furnish names of criminals who for some reason have in the past been associated with crimes of kidnapping and extortion are urged to submit to the Bureau for entry in its single fingerprint file the names, arrest or commitment numbers, and fingerprint classifications of these individuals, in order that the Bureau's file may be maintained as comprehensively as possible, on a truly national scope.
